

Critique 1

I have been through a lot in my life. Many things have affected the person I am today and how I react with the world. This then leads to how I try to reflect what I want the world to see me as. Five words I would chose that I would want the world to see me as are: unique, analytical, strategic, helpful, and tough.

Being unique I would say means that no one else is like you. Something is different. Either something big or small makes you different than anyone else. It could be something internal on how you think or something external on how you do something. For me I am unique in the way I bake or cook food. I either just make up my own recipes from scratch with just ideas in my head or I alter recipes to make them my own. When I play a game if there is a character people chose less then I usually pick that character. I don't like feeling like I am copying someone else when I play a game. I remember a long time ago I got this jacket that reminded me of a straight jacket and I loved it and how it would mess with people's heads. I would probably translate unique into visual representation by messing with either the way the letters look or the way people read the letters or a combination of both.

Someone who is analytical catches when something is wrong. They see when something has areas for improvement. In my past jobs I have always caught errors with how something is done or what is done. When I make food I always try to think of how I can improve the taste of that food. For games I think about ways to improve my kill/death ratio and ways to improve the use of different characters. Whenever I workout I am thinking of how to improve my workout by analyzing how to change the reps, sets, muscle groups, range of motion, grip, weight to maximize my workout. To translate being analytical into visual representation I would mess with the letters to look systematic or to involve rulers, crosshairs, or magnifying glasses into the letters.

A strategic outlook is taken when someone decides that there is a preferred way to handle what needs to be done. Whenever I write a recipe I think of how I would want it to look to maximize how quickly I could read the recipe so I could make food faster. I would put ingredients in the order they would be mixed and put lines between them for when they needed to be mixed and write how long and temperatures to the side or underneath. This minimizes the use of reading unnecessary words and makes baking and cooking way faster. For playing games I think of how to best get to where I need to be to kill an enemy. When I workout I think of the best way to order my workout so that it is fluent and minimizes downtime in accordance with how busy the gym is at the time and what machines people are using. In order to visually represent strategy I would probably mess with how the letters interact with the space available between the characters to a preferred way.

Being helpful is also important to me. It is always good to assist someone to get to where they need to be. This can be literal or not. I literally help my brother get from the bus station to my house a lot. I also help around the house doing my brothers dishes or helping friends get over some kind of ordeal in their lives. In games I try to help my allies by killing enemies who are after them or giving them support fire. Visually representing the word helpful would involve the use of the letters leaning on each other or lifting other characters up.

The last word to see me as is tough. Being tough is going through a lot of crazy situations, lifting heavy weights, and not cracking under pressure. In my life I have been through a lot of stuff. My family has fallen apart all over the place. I have had crazy conflicts with friends. For my body size I am extremely tough for lifting extremely heavy weights. I also have been relaxed through many intense situations at work. For visually representing tough I would make the letters big, bulgy, cemented, and grounded.

This concludes the 5 words that I would chose to describe me. These words are unique, analytical, strategic, helpful, and tough. Hopefully now these words will be understood as to why I chose them and how they are intertwined with my life. From this is this start of how these words would be visually represented by an individual such as myself.
